La Folle de Chaillot, or The Madwoman of Chaillot, was completed in 1942 by politician and playwright Jean Giraudoux in the midst of wartorn Vichy. During December of 1944, one month before his death, Giraudoux predicted that what would be his final piece for the theatre would premiere on Oct. 17, 1945. Little did he know before passing away in January of 1945 that his prophecy was not too far from reality.

After the German army surrendered on May 8, 1945, and the French government was restored, Giraudoux’s good friend Louis Jouvet returned from exile in South America. Giraudoux had sent Jouvet a newly completed script in 1942, so upon Jouvet’s return to France, he began the project of producing Giraudoux’s final play.

The first performance of La Folle de Chaillot was given for the benefit of the Association des resistants de 1940 on Dec. 19, 1945, only two months after Giraudoux’s predicted date. General de Gaulle sat in the audience, and the elite of Paris came to pay homage to the deceased playwright and to receive his last message.

Just as Giraudoux foresaw the date when his play might first be performed, he also foresaw the time when he could venture to speak his mind—not too openly, but rather to a new type of audience that thought only of returning to pre-war days. For Giraudoux, The Madwoman of Chaillot is a play of revolution, written for free men, which was no doubt his hope for France after the war. He saw the liberation of France from the German occupation as a mere detail of the real struggle that lay ahead, which must be a revolution to rid France of the profiteers, ones who seek to make an excessive or unfair profit.

Though this play was written 70 years ago, its message holds some relevance to controversies revolving around politics today, especially with concern of the energy crisis and to what means our government and corporations will resort when it comes to profiting from certain natural resources while polluting others along the way.

More importantly, what Giraudoux seems to have feared while writing The Madwoman of Chaillot was a progressive depletion of the fiber of humanity, through which, in the end, the whole value and beauty of life should disappear. He wrote, “It will not be so much a case of ugliness taking possession of the world as a kind of paralysis which will remove from the world all flavor and all light and make our state the most desperate of all, that of barbarism devoid of simplicity and naturalness.”

The French public of the post-war seemed to enjoy this message, this warning, as La Folle de Chaillot ran for 297 performances, night after night renewing the phenomenon of Giraudoux’s work for audiences waiting to rebuild themselves.
